But those who have spent some time in Hong Kong's skin, whether in the upper echelons of society or in chance, hush-hush conversations at cha chaan tengs, will be aware of the city's arrangements of kept women. It's strange then, that in the very city where you can walk into Wan Chai and slap down money for a night of pleasure, talking about mistre culture and its financial contracts is still considered taboo. But what's at the root of this culture - and how did it develop into a full-blown phenomenoni

The King eats alone.

After he wakes in his en-suite bedroom in the Royal Palace, he either skips breakfast or has a small snack before launching into the obligations of the day. He has a light lunch and, for dinner, when he isn't playing host, just fruit.

Ten years ago today, King Norodom Sihamoni was crowned after his father, the charismatic Norodom Sihanouk, abdicated for the second and final time. The new king was bathed by his parents in water from Phnom Kulen and carried through the palace gardens on a palanquin. A conch was blown and fireworks lit up the sky.

It was a splashy start to what has been a quiet decade.

Little is known about Sihamoni, but interviews with advisers and close associates paint a picture of a reflective, deliberate and cultured man who never wanted to be king, but took on the role graciously, keeping his old friends close and appeasing traditional enemies.

He is an abstemious king, a religious king, but far from an almighty one, as his father and the god-kings before him had been.

He shares his lifelong passion for the arts with his father, a prolific filmmaker. But unlike

A veteran Chinese journalist greeted the group and talked about the "historic" nature of the meeting: journalists from Greater China coming together to work on a highly sensitive investigation alongside colleagues from Europe and the U.S.

The meeting kicked off a six-month probe into the offshore holdings of China's elite that the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists begins publishing today with media partners from around the world. Along the way, the journalists faced cultural and linguistic barriers, government intimidation and the daunting task of sifting through thousands of secret financial records.

The Greater China files are the largest segment of the 2.5 million leaked offshore records ICIJ obtained and has analyzed with more than 50 media organizations since 2012. The documents reveal the real owners and the dealings of more than 100,000 companies in 10 offshore jurisdictions.

The stories previously published in the "Offshore Leaks" series have had impact across the globe, triggering inquiries, resignations and policy changes in several countries.

Due to the complexity and language challenges posed by the China, Hong Kong and Taiwan records, ICIJ set aside files related to those jurisdictions for a later installment in the series.

With China continuing to step up media censorship, security quickly became one of the China project's biggest priorities. At the end of the Hong Kong meeting all project members returned to their newsrooms equipped with encryption for email communications. An encrypted online forum was used to swap findings and tips safely.

A special Lloyd's List investigation goes behind Nanjing Tanker's great wall of obfuscation to examine how off-balance-sheet syndicated loans brought the Chinese tanker giant to its knees

The following investigative article is published in collaboration with Caixin, a Beijing-based business publication owned by Caixin Media. The collaboration with Caixin represents a first for Lloyd's List with any publication, and, more importantly, a first for Lloyd's List in China, now the key centre of global shipping. Caixin is dedicated to producing independent investigative news and analysis of China's markets, politics, businesses, culture, environment, media, and law. A Chinese language version of the story by Lloyd's List reporter Jing Yang and Caixin Media reporter Wu Jing is published simultaneously on Caixin New Century Weekly magazine and caixin.com. Copyright of both English and Chinese version is co-owned by Lloyd's List and Caixin Media.

How we did Offshore Leaks China

A multinational team of journalists spent months combing through secret tax haven records revealing offshore holdings of China's rich and powerful.

By Marina Walker Guevara

January 21, 2014, 10:00 pm http://www.icij.org/blog/2014/01/how-we-did-offshore-leaks-china

The small group of journalists gathering in Hong Kong on a rainy summer morning had arrived from all over: Beijing, Taipei, New York, Madrid, Washington, Berkeley and Munich.

A veteran Chinese journalist greeted the group and talked about the "historic" nature of the meeting: journalists from Greater China coming together to work on a highly sensitive investigation alongside colleagues from Europe and the U.S.

The meeting kicked off a six-month probe into the offshore holdings of China's elite that the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists begins publishing today with media partners from around the world. Along the way, the journalists faced cultural and linguistic barriers, government intimidation and the daunting task of sifting through thousands of secret financial records.

The Greater China files are the largest segment of the 2.5 million leaked offshore records ICIJ obtained and has analyzed with more than 50 media organizations since 2012. The documents reveal the real owners and the dealings of more than 100,000 companies in 10 offshore jurisdictions.
